Went long at the break of the test candle marked with green line.

Chart is 15 min EU, and test was on most recent 15 min trigger level.

Comments and critique appreciated.

The one thing I have found in my trading and I am actually going to look back and see if this is the case is that tests of triggers tend to be more successful after price has moved away some from the trigger bar before testing. I have noted other examples like the one you posted where we never moved away at all before printing a test bar and in turn the trade was never very successful. Also the shear volume and spread of the test bar is a bit odd... yes the volume was lower than the previous 2 bars but relative to previous volumes it was still quite high.

Interesting... something to investigate further.

Edit... also note how flat and limp the hull is... indicative of a rangy market.
